Addiction treatment for uniformed professionals

Geisinger

Geisinger Marworth offers a special Uniformed Professionals Treatment Program for police officers, firefighters, corrections officers, first responders and others working in similar roles who abuse drugs or alcohol. This program builds the framework to help them return to a functional life and remain sober.

Unique challenges

Uniformed professionals with an addiction often face these obstacles:

- Back-to-work implications
- Confidentiality concerns
- Exposure to trauma and post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD)
- Focus on taking care of others, but not themselves
- High-profile status in profession and community
- High-stress work environment
- Risk of physical danger
- Special family dynamics

Enhanced services

In addition to our inpatient program for addiction recovery, Marworth blends the following components into the Uniformed Professionals Treatment Program:

- Dedicated counselors experienced in working with uniformed professionals and trauma
- Dual-diagnosis education, therapy and support
- Grief counseling
- Intensive group therapy with other uniformed professionals
- Network of recovering uniformed professionals who serve as contacts and assist our professional staff as 12-step program support members
- Re-entry planning for the transition back to work, family and community
- Relapse prevention groups designed for uniformed professionals
- Stress management training
- Trauma and PTSD support groups

Trauma in uniformed professionals

Those in public safety professions are at a high risk for experiencing trauma. To address this, Marworth delivers an integrated approach for uniformed professionals who are also trauma survivors through trauma informed therapy, which focuses on topics such as:

- Anger and trauma
- Asking for help
- Boundaries
- Grounding skills
- Recovery thinking
